Animal Discoveries

Scientists discover more than 15,000 animal species each year. That's about 1 percent of the more than 1.5 million species we know about already. At the same time, extinction is wiping out species at record rates around the globe. So each new species is an exciting and important discovery.

Scientists estimate that vertebrates-- animals with backbones-- represent only 3 percent of all species. They include those species that are the most familiar (and similar) to us: amphibians, reptiles, birds, fish, and mammals. The remaining 97 percent of animal species known to science are invertebrates-- animals without backbones.

Which of the following is true about the 15,000 new animal species discovered each year?

- A They are similar to many of the species already identified.
- B They represent about 1 percent of species already identified.
- C They are a smaller amount than those species that become extinct.
- D They represent 3 percent of all vertebrates.

Traditional body painting called mehndi is still practiced in India, the Middle East, and North Africa. Mehndi is used on many special occasions. Brides wear it on their hands and feet. In some ethnic groups, it is used to decorate the faces of children. A reddish-brown powder from the henna plant is applied to the skin using a plastic cone. The intricate, fine-lined designs may last from two weeks to several months.

Traditional tattoos for males in Samoa

Among the people of Samoa, a South Pacific island, men wear bold, dark gray tattoos that extend from the waist to the knees. Their tattoos include traditional designs such as animals and geometric patterns. Samoan women's tattoos are more varied but always include a diamond shape on the backs of the knees. For Samoans, tattoos represent adulthood and a willingness to serve their community.
